It is impossible for us to see how he became liable to this pseudiar action, as the bill of exceptions is entirely siteal as to the character of his holding, or in what mode, or under what curcumstances he obtained the possession. If Eddiemon was a tenant of Fannon when he died, in 1857, either by contract or implication, and Bird entered under a contract or purchase from him, or otherwise under him or his claim, he would occupy his shoes, and be liable to this action to the landlord. The case imperfectly shadowed forth in the bill of exceptions is this: That Fannon and Eddlemon were jount owners of the tract of land in question, and

But whether he entered under a contract with Eddle-mon, or under a claim of right, or as a trespasser, does not in any way appear. On that point the proof is entirely silent. If he entured in any way under Eddlemon, the Court correctly held he would road.
